

APPENDIX A:

Summary information compiled by local experts

This document has been compiled by local independent experts in Azerbaijan who wish to remain anonymous fearing imminent reprisals by the increasingly repressive regime. Should the EBRD leadership be interested in hearing further details these experts are available for a series of meetings at the EBRD headquarters.

The income from the energy revenue has for years been spent on fuelling a repressive machine. Funds coming from energy resources have been used to secure loyalty from law enforcement agencies so they can be used for the mass oppression of critical voices.

Unlimited presidential term

In the summer of 2008, the Azerbaijan parliament had rejected the Venice Commission and OSCE's Joint Opinion, dated June 2008, stressing the need for parity in the election commissions. Azerbaijan's election commissions remained under control of the ruling Yeni Azərbaycan Partiyası (YAP), taking decisions with two-thirds majority. As long as this is the case, the opposition argued, "fraud during the counting and tabulation of votes" cannot be prevented.

Furthermore, in 2009, the authorities took an unprecedented step of further centralizing the power in the hands of the ruling establishment. In December 2008, the ruling party announced draft constitutional changes. In March 2009, the referendum took place and 29 articles of the constitution were amended, the most important change being the abolition of the presidential term limit. (The constitution limited presidents to two five-year terms). The constitution change was widely condemned including by the Venice Commission.

In March 2009 the Council of Europe's Venice Commission, the advisory body on constitutional matters, criticized the constitutional amendments, stating that they distort the balance of power and contradict European practice<sup>4</sup>. The main concerns raised by the reforms relate to the abolition of the two-term limit to the office of President and to the President's position. Under the previous provisions, the President could only be elected for two consecutive terms, and the amendment abolished the limit to the number of terms.

According to the Venice Commission's opinion,<sup>5</sup> "Azerbaijan, the Constitution of which provides for a Presidential system of Government, is undoubtedly a country where the President concentrates extensive powers in his hands, given the few checks and balances which exist. It was therefore logical that the original text of the Constitution of Azerbaijan provided for a two-term limit. ... As a rule, it can be said that the abolition of existing limits preventing the unlimited re-election of a President is a step back, in terms of democratic achievements. ... Explicit constitutional limitations on the successive terms of a president are particularly important in countries where democratic structures and their cultural presuppositions have not yet been consolidated."<sup>6</sup>

Under the European Convention on Human Rights, all citizens of Council of Europe member states have a right to democratic governance. The removal of a presidential term limit in Azerbaijan (Article 101, V)<sup>7</sup> violates the European Convention of Human Rights<sup>8</sup> and constitutes a breach of international law.<sup>9</sup>

The case of Ilgar Mammadov, critic of the Southern Gas Corridor (TAP/ TANAP)

The recent crackdown began in 2013 in the run up to the Presidential Elections with those opposing the government being beaten and jailed. The government of Azerbaijan refuses to comply with international demands and immediately set free prominent opposition leader, Ilgar Mammadov, after the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe made a second call demanding his release. Igar Mammadov has been one of the most outspoken critics of the Southern Gas Corridor (TAP/TANAP) project. He was a member of advisory board of the Revenue Watch Institute (RWI). He was arrested in February 2013 and then sentenced to seven years in jail on trumped up, politically-motivated charges in March 2014.

Civil society crackdown

As stated on the EBRD website, “civil society organisations are both influential audiences and partners of EBRD in its countries of operations. They provide a valuable contribution to the development of the Bank’s policies, strategies and the implementation of projects, particularly on complex, large scale operations”.

After Aliyev secured a third term in the office through a deeply flawed election, he has started an unprecedented “witch hunt” against those who challenged the legitimacy of the election. Human rights activists, journalists, and other regime critics were subjected to criminal charges and physical and financial harassment. Numerous nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) had their bank accounts frozen and many were forced to close, completely shutting up the space for political discourse.

Over the last few years, the climate for civil society in Azerbaijan has deteriorated to the point where it seriously threatens the ability of civil society organizations (CSOs) to engage effectively in the watch dog activities such as tackling corruption and promoting safe and sustainable environment.

The USAID Civil Society Organization Sustainability Index (CSOSI) which since 1997 has been used to assess international and regional trends in the civil society sector and to identify common obstacles impeding the sector's sustainability, such as the legal environment, organizational capacity, and financial viability, points out to serious deterioration of sustainability of civil society in Azerbaijan:

The legal environment in Azerbaijan has deteriorated markedly, dropping from the bottom of the Sustainability Evolving category to the middle of the Sustainability Impeded category. Since the end of 2013, several amendments were made to the laws governing CSOs that significantly limit the operational environment for civil society. In addition, in 2014 the government launched an unprecedented wave of investigations into the offices of domestic and foreign CSOs, followed by interference in their activities, freezing of their bank accounts, and unjustified refusals to register grant contracts. As a result of these changes, Azerbaijan now has the lowest score it has recorded in this dimension since 2000.

Problems have been documented for some time, but have become particularly acute since February 2014, when new amendments to a number of pieces of legislation which regulate civil society activities in Azerbaijan came into force and when the government instituted what can only be described as a crackdown on independent non-governmental organizations (NGOs), especially those that dared to be critical of the authorities. This has been wide ranging, but it has particularly targeted groups which promote government transparency and accountability. This includes members of the NGO Coalition for “Increasing Transparency in Extractive Industries” (EITI NGO Coalition), many of which are the same groups which have been engaged in promoting the transparency and economic freedom in the country.

Serious problems: from devaluation to violations of property rights

The devaluation of the national currency (AZN) alongside the oil price fall has increased social problems in the country. Because of difficulties with liquidity many large banks have started to claim their loans back from entrepreneurs. For example, in order to solve the problem of the loans issued by the International Bank of Azerbaijan –in which the state is the main shareholder-- authorities ordered mass arrests of more than 200 businessmen. During the arrests, the officers from the law enforcement agencies put pressure on the businessmen either to return the loan far before the initial scheduled deadline or to give all their assets to the bank. In fact, for the first time within last the 10 years, the regime has engaged in open misappropriation of private assets. The similar misappropriation took place in 2005 when the regime took control of largest private energy company Azpetrol.

Furthermore, because of serious financial situation in the country Azerbaijani authorities announced privatization plans for the International Bank of Azerbaijan. Local and international experts fear the country’s largest bank will be privatized on the basis of the corruption scheme, similar to the one used to privatize another large bank (which is now owned by Aliyev family) several years back. Against the background of systematic problems in economy and an anticipated inevitable drop of credit ratings, the ruling elite continues to benefit from oil resources at the expense of the Azerbaijani people.

Lukoil in Azerbaijan

According to research data by local experts, Lukoil has, for years, been engaged in mass violation of labor rights. The company has built strong ties with the ruling elite. The company has not done any significant activity to protect environment. Lukoil served as a mediator in negotiations between the Kremlin administration and Aliyev. Following Russia’ s aggression in Ukraine Lukoil has been subjected to international sanctions. For years, Lukoil worked with Yanukovich regime so it could be deemed responsible for current situation in Ukraine.

Because of the lack of transparent policy, it is not known who are real shareholders of Lukoil in Azerbaijan and how income is distributed. Local experts have serious concerns that top government officials have their shares in Lukoil Azerbaijan.

Transparency and anti-corruption activities

The recent anti-corruption measures employed by the regime are nothing but imitation of the fight against corruption. While authorities seem to tackle small scale, bureaucratic or petty corruption by establishing ASAN Services Center Azerbaijan legislative framework creates the basis for offshore zone.

In 2012, the government adopted a series of regressive amendments to the law on the right to obtain information, the law on the state registration of legal entities, and the law on commercial secrets.

On 6 July 2012, President Aliyev signed into law amendments limiting the disclosure of information by corporate entities, which had been adopted by Parliament on 12 June 2012. Strongly criticized by pro-transparency groups, the changes curtail public access to information about the ownership of commercial entities, the amount of their charter capital, ownership structure, and other similar data. These amendments, known as the “corporate secrecy amendments,” became effective in October 2012.

The amendments to the 2005 law on commercial information prohibit government officials from distributing information about companies if doing so “contradicts the national interests of Azerbaijan in political, economic, and monetary policy, the defense of public order, the health and moral values of the people, or harms the commercial or other interests of individuals.” The reforms also make the release of information contingent upon receiving permission from all individuals named in the records.

The laws on the right to obtain information and the state registration of legal entities were also amended. The amendments extend the scope of “legitimate public interests” protected in Article 3 of the Constitutional Law of the Republic of Azerbaijan on Regulation of the Exercise of Human Rights and Freedoms, and use language that lacks precision and clarity.

The amendments to the law on the state registration of legal entities makes secret the registration information for commercial legal entities, including information about their founders and shareholders. Such information can now only be disclosed on the basis of an inquiry to the courts and investigative bodies, to the subjects of operational search activities in cases specified by law, and to financial monitoring bodies in the cases and manner specified by the law “on the struggle against legalization of funds or other property obtained through criminal means and financing of terrorism.” According to the bill, this information can only be disclosed to relevant bodies, lawyers, and third parties following the consent of the information-owner.

The amendments contradict Article 10.2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which stipulates: “The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.” The amendments also contradict provisions of the UN Convention against Corruption and the UN’s Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy.<sup>10</sup>

The amendments can be viewed as an action by the Azerbaijani government to reject the obligations it had previously undertaken before the Azerbaijani people and the international community to fight corruption. They increase restrictions on freedom of information and breach the principles of transparency and public control over the activity of legal entities.

The Council of Europe's Group of States Against Corruption (GRECO) group criticized these amendments.
